ABSTRACT:

Encopresis does not classify as a disease; instead, it manifests as a symptom influenced by a complex interplay between bodily functions and psychological or environmental stressors. This condition, often encountered in middle childhood, involves the involuntary passage of stools into the underwear well beyond the typical age of toilet training. Affecting approximately 1.5 percent of young school children, encopresis brings about significant distress and embarrassment for both the affected children and their families. A system of medicine known as homoeopathy takes a holistic approach to treating sick people. Individualization is the foundation of homoeopathy prescription, which can be accomplished in a number of ways. One of these many prescription approaches, the Keynote technique, needs to be supported by documentation of sufficient and reliable evidence. This article presents a case of encopresis treated with homoeopathic medicine based on keynote prescription.
